TOP 10 LIES

Table Scraps are bad:

Leftovers of lean meat or a little cheese make good compliments to your animals diet adding extra protien and variety. Do avoid cooked bones, gravies and sweets.

Dry Kibble is good for the teeth:

Animals tend to chew up their food and swallow it in chunks, which does not do anything for their teeth. Some commercial pet foods also contain ingredients that contribute to dental problems.

Raw meat causes aggression:

There is no evidence that proves raw meet can cause animals to become more ornery over their food. Food aggression is a behavioural issue and has nothing to do with their diet.

Stick to one diet - it's good for them:

Feeding the same food every day can lead to nutrient deficiencies or excess allergies and other problems.

If it's at my Vet clinic, it must be quality food!

Prescription foods are usually made by large commercial pet food manufactures that use questionable ingredients. It maybe helpful short term for dealing with acute issues, but not as a replacement for a natural diet.

All bones are dangerous:

It's only cooking that makes bones brittle and prone to splintering. A suitable size raw meaty bone or chicken neck is perfectly safe.

Semi moist food is more like meat:

It only looks like meat. Most semi-moist foods are filled with junk, artificial ingredients, colors and preservatives to keep them soft.

Cats should have food 24/7:

In the wild, cats do not have access to food at all times. Like dogs they only eat when they hunt. Free feeding is the biggest cause of obesity in felines.

Cheap food saves money:

It might seem like its saving you money but cheap food leads to health problems in the future.

Raw diets make my animal sick:

Dogs and cats have a shorter digestive track then we do so raw meat passes through their digestive tract before causing parasitic illness. If you use prepared frozen diets, remember to thaw and only keep the meat for a maximum of three days. Thoroughly clean utensils, bowls and countertops after each use.
